The incentive is that many in the City are dissatisfied. They are fed up with not being given sufficient public input; they are getting more and more disturbed about rampant multi-family density and they are increasingly fed up with Mayor Sharp's travels.

In short citizens of the City want improved governance. Now, whether that means they would be open-minded about at least discussing amalgamation, who knows. Suffice it to say that 160 British Columbians have spent a whole year taking a look at a better way of electing their representatives and I have no doubt we could find a group of say, twenty in each of the two municipalities who would be willing to dedicate themselves to at least talking about the pros and cons for the two North Vancoovers.

Dear Ms James:

You are still thinking like a rational person even though it is not very relevant in politics.

The bottom line is that all the studies in the world and all facilitations in the world will be useless if the City is not interested in amalgamating with the District and I can tell you they are not. Their taxes are lower, they are run better, and above all they now get the benefits provided by the District free of charge - tell me where is the incentive?

They have made it abundantly clear that they do not want to amalgamate with the District. In light of that, my suggestion is the only solution at least until the people in the District wake up and the last time I checked they were still fast asleep - indeed I don't even know whether the majority were still breathing, there being no Hockey season.

Gentlemen:

Before I make my main point, I wish to emphasize that I do not support BC's current model of regionalization; this is particularly so with respect to GVRD and TransLink. That said.....

It does not make any sense to me to have BC communities as small as 725 with full councils and almost a full administration. Today's taxpayers cannot afford such bills.

On the North Shore, we have a vivid urban example. Here, we have two, geographically contiguous, municipalities with a combined population of only +/- 150,000. While they do cooperate on provision of some services, they irresponsibly spar on others - the Rec Commission being but one - very expensive - example.

At this stage of the game, to do as Clr. Crist suggests - essentially pick up our marbles and go play by ourselves - may well be the only feasible action to take right now, and there is little doubt it would be better than the status quo.

What would be far preferable, in my opinion, would be for the two municipalities to hire outside facilitators to examine the two operations with a view to answering the question: Would North Vancouver taxpayers be better or worse off if the two communities were to be amalgamated under one council and administration?

My own suggestion is that a single council, increased by two members for a total of nine, would be elected in 2008 and that, in the interim, the two staff contingents would be integrated - layoffs to be achieved over 1.5 to 2 council terms, as much as possible by attrition. To alleviate concerns on the part of each population, I envision a Mayor and four councillors being elected 'at large' with the addition of 2 councillors being elected in each of the current two North Vancouvers - i.e. a partial ward system.

In summary, I believe the problems being experienced with the Rec Commission are merely the most noticeable symptom of a much deeper and more expensive problem than has yet been realized. One only has to look at City voters who are balking at being overwhelmed by density [they obviously would prefer to be closer to the District model of growth] and the ongoing assertions by many District residents that they are subsidizing City recreation programs, to know that it is past time for the amalgamation discussion to take place in earnest.

However, my guess is that this discussion needs to be initiated and conducted by citizens themselves. Why? Because the interests of both councils and staffs will be threatened by such a move and because, left to those bodies, matters would have to get an awful lot worse before they would ever make the move themselves.

In the meantime, I support Clr. Crist's Motion.

Sincerely,
Liz James
