Dear Editor,

If we are to believe the gist of the DNV council debate regarding the Whiteley Court development proposal, the option is either give up rental units, of which there is already a short supply in the district, or allow highrises. This is the spin which the developer, staff, and district council have been trying to sell to the public.

But a reduction in rental space is necessary if a tower is going to be avoided, explained Michael Hartford, a community planner with the district. Mr. Hartford makes it sound like the district must acquiesce to the developer if we want a development. I say, then we don't want a development...go away developer. The Whiteley Court PROPOSAL does nothing for the residents of Lynn Valley except provide more traffic and pollution and fewer rental units than currently exist. Period!
